

Abstract

Erich Round
University of Queensland

I discuss the methodology of comparative research in linguistics and in neighbouring disciplines such as anthropology and biology. In addition to considerable overlap, there are concepts, practices and insights that have limited currency in linguistics but whose adoption or adaptation may be advantageous, both for traditional linguistic typological research and in the context of newer, emerging linguistic methods.